Intergenerational Learning in Practice

Together Old and Young

Edited by Margaret Kernan and Giulia Cortellesi

With a focus on the learning relationships between young children and older adults, this book offers a unique contribution to the field of intergenerational learning. Introducing the most important concepts, theories and research about this innovative area of work, chapters offer a broad array of perspectives on intergenerational learning ranging from pedagogy, to architecture, planning, community development and education for sustainable development. It provides resources to develop and improve intergenerational learning practice. Based on innovative global practice, this is an essential resource for early childhood educators and those interested in building all age-friendly communities.

About the Editors

Margaret Kernan has spent the last 30 years working internationally in the fields of education and development, as a teacher, researcher and trainer and has published widely in these areas. Since 2012 Margaret is overall coordinator of the TOY Programme, which focusses on intergenerational learning between young children and older people.

Giulia Cortellesi is a cultural anthropologist with more than 10 years of experience as researcher and trainer in the field of ECEC and social inclusion. Since 2012, Giulia has been working with Margaret Kernan in the TOY Programme and is overall coordinator of the TOY for Inclusion Project, which explores how intergenerational learning embedded in ECEC initiatives can support intercultural dialogue and social cohesion.
